The Assassin Who Couldn't Dance Glen Barrera

Blue-eyed Hector Munoz (his present name) is fluent in five languages, can kill a man a hundred different ways and yet, at twenty-three had learned almost nothing about life and love. His father and brother were brutally murdered by corrupt U.S. military officers when he was seven. The teacher, a close friend of his father, took control of the boy's life, as well as the future debt to be paid. Now, after years of rigorous training, the assassin is judged ready. But is he? The plan to draw out the officers has been set into motion. Hector has only to illegally cross the border from Mexico and retrieve keys to safe deposit boxes containing eight-million dollars and incriminating documents before the officers can respond. It shouldn't be a problem. But then Hector's plan didn't include Mexican bandits; ruthless mercenaries also after the keys and led by a sadistic cowboy; or a sleazy Chicago mob figure. Things get more complicated for him when a third party joins the search for the keys, the crazed leader of a militia group with a secret room in his basement reserved for "guests" – and then falling in love with an escaped guest, Lucy. Hector also didn't realize that the mercenaries' target, an ex-Force Recon team holding the keys and the last four men to see his father alive, were far from old and rusty. In the race for the keys, Hector must confront the emotional emptiness in his life that he wasn't allowed to experience in his quest for vengeance. With time running out, he is forced to make a choice: follow the assassination plan or ally with the surviving recon team, their families, and Lucy before they are eliminated; and, maybe discover who he really is.
